Guided Missile In Feather

By John K. Terres

Whoosh a moment ago he was only a speck in the blue, now the power diving peregrine is a stream lined missile, homing in on a luckless pigeon with radar like accuracy, watch him wheel into position above his prey. He wastes not a single wing flap, yet it has been said that the speed of all other birds, His beeline strike is deadly. Look the pigeon is killed instantly by the impact. Now the long hooked talons encircle the limp form with a grip of steel and he calmly makes off for some secluded place feasting on its grounds. History reminds us that men have long admired the most spectacular of hawks. Ancients wrote about them. Early King perfected methods of falconry was considered the noblest of arts by these seventeenth century kings, it was a custom to train falcons in the capture of other birds and even animals for sport and food. The peregrine was one of the hawks chiefly used. in those days guns were rare and powder was feeble and the only chance of bringing down a bird that flew out of arrow range was to send a falcon after it such bloodthirsty hunters did these falcons become that Frederick II kept over the birds head until game was spotted lest the falcon turn on its master. Among ornithologists today there is a feeling of mingled awe and admiration for the peregrine of mingled awe and admiration for the peregrine such as no other birds can inspire, in addition to his wonderfully swift flight the peregrine falcon is also admired even today for its fiery spirit, yet they are not without their tender emotions the.
